David Fevyer (Researcher)

David Fevyer has a background in English Literature and worked for a number of years in Technology Enhanced Learning in the UK Higher Education sector. He is passionate about active travel, and in 2019 made a career move into this area by undertaking the MSc in Transport Planning and Management at the University of Westminster. His dissertation focused on how fatal collisions involving bicycle riders and pedestrians are reported in press coverage. His research interests include the cultural representation of active travel modes and how this influences public opinion and political action, and the use of data in local advocacy and public communication.
